"In Pursuit of Global Competitiveness"

INTRODUCTION

In line with the 'Make in India' move it is of utmost importance to interpret the sources of Intellectual Property (IP), identify the IP which is available for business and academic use without infringements and to protect our existing IP. It's interesting to know that IP is a techno legal subject and it's time to get to understand various facets of IP. Intellectual property (IP) refers to a cluster of exclusive rights that are legally recognized. A patent is a set of exclusive rights granted by a government to an inventor or applicant. Common types of intellectual property rights include copyrights, trademarks, patents, industrial design rights and trade secrets. Most of the R&D organizations have in-house facilities to provide patent support. However, most of the academic institutions do not have such facility. Therefore it is planned to organize Two days workshop on , Innovations, Inventions and Patents to create awareness of IPR among scientists, faculties, research scholars and UG/PG students of engineering and technology.
